

STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL

The Legend of the Silver Woods

Long ago, before the mountains were named and the rivers found their paths, there was a forest that shimmered like moonlight even at noon. The locals called it the Silver Woods. It was said that the trees there didn't grow from the soil, but from the memories of the earth itself.

Travelers who ventured deep into the thicket often spoke of a strange silence - a silence so heavy it felt like a physical presence. There were no birds, no rustling leaves, only the soft glow of the bark and the occasional whisper of the wind through the hollow trunks. Some believed the forest was a bridge to another world, while others thought it was a guardian of secrets long forgotten by men.

In the heart of the woods stood a single, massive oak, its branches reaching out like frozen lightning. Legend has it that anyone who touched the bark of the Great Oak would see a vision of their own future. But the price was high: for every second of clarity, one would lose a day of their past.

Many tried to find the tree, but the Silver Woods were not easily navigated. The paths shifted with the moon, and the landmarks faded like mist. Only those with a truly empty mind and a patient heart could hope to reach the center.

Today, the forest is gone, swallowed by the expanding plains and the passage of centuries. But sometimes, on a cold winter night, one can still see a faint silver shimmer on the horizon, a reminder of the magic that once was.

This document has been digitally signed and verified.